Abstract

This study aims to explore the changes in the levels of idiomaticity in the Croatian translations of phraseological units in The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue. For this purpose, the first translation by Tin Ujević (1952) was compared to its retranslations by Nada Šoljan (1974) and Saša Drach (2008). The research is based on the assumptions of the retranslation hypothesis (RH) that first translations are TT-oriented, while retranslations are ST-oriented. The first research question being tested is whether retranslations will be more ST-oriented by using more adherence strategies during the translation process of PUs than the TT-oriented first translations, while the second research question aims to determine whether the first translations will be more TT-oriented by using more literalization and deletion strategies than the ST-oriented retranslations. The findings show that in The Black Cat a reverse trend can be observed, while in The Murders in the Rue Morgue the first retranslation observes the pattern of the RH, while the second deviates from it. These findings demonstrate that while elements of the RH can be observed during the translation process of PU-idiomaticity, it is not the norm due to intratextual and extratextual factors that influence the translations.

Sažetak

Cilj ovog istraživanja jest istražiti promjene u razini idiomatičnosti u hrvatskim prijevodima frazeoloških jedinica u Crnom mačku i Ubojstvima u ulici Morgue. U tu svrhu, prvi prijevod Tina Ujevića (1952.) uspoređen je s ponovnim prijevodima Nade Šoljan (1974.) i Saše Dracha (2008.). Istraživanje se temelji na hipotezi o ponovnim prijevodima koja pretpostavlja kako su prvi prijevodi orijentirani prema ciljnom tekstu, dok su ponovni prijevodi orijentirani prema izvornom tekstu. Prvo istraživačko pitanje na koje se nastoji odgovoriti jest, hoće li ponovni prijevodi biti više orijentirani prema izvornom tekstu korištenjem više strategija pridržavanja (adherence) tijekom prevođenja frazeoloških jedinica nego prvi prijevodi koji bi trebali biti usmjereni prema ciljnom tekstu, dok je cilj drugog istraživačkog pitanja utvrditi hoće li prvi prijevodi biti više orijentirani prema ciljnom tekstu zbog češćeg korištenja strategija literalizacije (literalization) i brisanja (deletion) od ponovnih prijevoda koji bi trebali biti orijentirani prema izvornom tekstu. Rezultati pokazuju da se u Crnom mačku može uočiti obrnuti trend, dok u Ubojstvima u ulici Morgue prvi ponovni prijevod prati obrazac hipoteze o ponovnim prijevodima, za razliku od drugog ponovnog prijevoda. Ovi rezultati pokazuju da, premda se elementi hipoteze o ponovnim prijevodima mogu razaznati tijekom prevođenja idiomatičnosti frazeoloških jedinica, zbog raznih unutartekstualnih i izvantekstualnih čimbenika koji utječu na prijevode, to nije uvijek slučaj.

1. Introduction

American writer, poet and critic, Edgar Allan Poe was renowned for his writings depicting the grotesque worlds of mystery and the macabre. His poems and short stories occupy a focal point in the American and World Literature of the 19th century and are recognizable by their unique imagery, vocabulary and figurative language. The short stories The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue present some of his most popular and influential works. The Black Cat is a prime example of his horror and gothic fiction, while The Murders in the Rue Morgue counts among his most influential instances of detective fiction. While Poe's imagery, themes and language have been thoroughly studied, much less attention has been given to the way he uses phraseological units in his works and how those phraseological units (PUs) are translated into foreign languages. Given that phraseological units are defined as “conventionalized multiword combinations that are holistically stored and automatically reproduced, and that vary in frequency of occurrence, fixedness of form and compositeness of meaning”, they represent a vital stylistic feature of the source text and its subsequent translations (Omazić 2015: 20).

One of the distinct features of PUs is idiomaticity, i.e., the “nativelike selection of expression” (Warren 2005: 35). Changing the level of idiomaticity in a translation would lead to a significant change in the stylistic and connotative potential of the source text in its translated form. Hence, in this paper, the changes in the degree of idiomaticity of phraseological units occurring in Poe's The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue and their subsequent translation into Croatian will be analyzed. For this purpose, three Croatian translations released during different periods will be used: the translations by Tin Ujević (1952), Nada Šoljan (1974) and Saša Drach (2008). The two retranslations present an excellent opportunity to observe the changes in the patterns of how phraseological units are translated and how these changes align with the retranslation hypothesis proposed by Bensimon and Berman in the special issue of the French journal Palimpsestes (1990) dedicated to the subject of retranslation. The retranslation hypothesis supposes that first translations have an introductory function and are more domesticating than the subsequent retranslations that aim to restore original elements of the source text. There are many translations that align with the retranslation hypothesis, but not many attempts have been made to test whether there are observable changes in way phraseological units are (re)translated in works of literature. Therefore, the aim of this study is to test whether the changes in idiomaticity of the PU Croatian translations of The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue align with the retranslation hypothesis, i.e., whether the first translations are more target text oriented than the retranslations, leading to a loss of idiomaticity, making retranslations more source text oriented, with idiomatic units being preserved. Achieving the appropriate degree of phraseological density of a translation is important because of their stylistic, emotive and connotative potential that ought to be preserved in the translations to faithfully transfer the language patterns of the original. In line with this aim two hypotheses were put forward. The first is that retranslations of Edgar Allan Poe's The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue into Croatian will be more ST-oriented by using more adherence strategies than the TT oriented first translations, while the second is that first translations of Edgar Allan Poe's The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue into Croatian will be more TT-oriented by using more literalization and deletion strategies than the ST-oriented retranslations.

2. Background

Phraseology is a linguistic discipline concerned with the study of multi-word groups that form functionally and semantically separate units. While the theoretical and descriptive study of PUs has a long tradition in the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, its introduction into Western Europe and the USA came progressively. In the early 1980s, phraseology was still regarded “as a linguistic activity of only minority interest and poor prospects of recognition as a level of language or of linguistic description” in the West, and the linguistic study of phraseology was kept within the bounds of the dictionary-making process (Cowie 1998: 18). During the 1980s, partly because of the end of the Russian and Eastern European intellectual isolation, the achievements of their linguists were gradually introduced to a wider audience.

Phraseological units are multi-word groups which can encompass transparent units, semi-transparent units, as well as the non-compositional and opaque idioms. They also demonstrate a wide range of fixedness of form, being either invariable or allowing different degrees of changes on the morphological, lexical and syntactic level, including changes in lexemes, tense, number and word order (Omazić 2015: 22). Some units may even allow deletion of items. The categorization of phraseological units depends on the degree of transparency and variability of the units, which are scalar, not bipolar values. As a result, lexically frozen items (fixed structures) can be placed on the far end of the scale (“smell a rat”), partially variable units (“get/have cold feet”) closer to the center, while free combinations, i.e., open collocations, with full transparency and componentiality (“to roll up the carpet/one’s sleeves/stocking”) are on the other end of the scale (Omazić 2015: 22-23).

The usage of the term phraseological units to denote structurally and semantically inseparable multi-word groups which consist of a specific group of phrases was first introduced by Soviet linguists (Ginzburg 1979: 74). Due to its long tradition, Russian phraseological terminology is more extensive and uniform than the still developing terminology of other linguistic traditions (Burger 2007: 15). On the other hand, Western phraseology is still striving to achieve terminological uniformity and there are no clear-cut borders between the various terms denoting phraseological elements. Yet, the increased interest in the subject area in the 1980s has amplified the need for establishing a more uniform terminology that had seemingly been achieved in other linguistic fields.

3. Terminology: Disambiguation

The lack of PU terminological uniformity can be attributed to the fact that the borders between what one scholar considers as one term often overlaps with a term proposed by another author. Furthermore, some might use different terms to denote identical or similar units of language, or in contrast, the same term is used to describe different units (Moon 1998: 2). Some word-groups can even meet the criteria for more than one categorization, which ultimately leads to various terms for these multi-word units. Categorization of multi-word units also depends on a variety of criteria, and the definitions greatly depend on the tradition and theoretical outlook, since linguistic and translation scholars can take a broader or narrower terminological approach to defining phraseological units. As a result, there are many terms that overlap with the definition of phraseological units, for instance, fixed-expressions, word-equivalents, set-phrases, phrasemes, collocations and idioms.

The general term “fixed expressions” encompasses different phrasal lexemes, phraseological units and multi-word lexical items (Moon 1998: 2). Another general term that is frequently used is “word equivalents”. This term highlights both the semantic and functional stability of word groups, as well as their capacity to function as single words in speech (Ginzburg 1979: 74). Set-phrases are defined by the “stability of lexical components and grammatical structures” of their word-groups (Ginzburg 1979: 74). The editors of Phraseology: An International Handbook of Contemporary Research propose the usage of the term “phraseme” in the narrow sense as a generic term for idioms and collocations (Burger 2007: 12). On the other hand, they advocate the usage of terms “formulaic language”, “fixed word connections” and “formulaic texts” in the broad sense.

The term “collocations” has an important place in corpus-based research. Mona Baker defines collocations as “the tendency of certain words to co-occur regularly in a given language”, a tendency that depends on their “collocational meaning” (Baker 1992: 47). Collocational patterns reflect the favored “modes of expressions” and “linguistic configurations” of certain language communities (Baker 1992: 49). However, Baker’s restrictive approach to defining collocations has since evolved into a more general view of the term. Another term that frequently co-occurs with PUs is the ambiguous term idiom. Idioms are widely regarded as units of language which have a fixed form and are semantically opaque and whose meaning is metaphorical, i.e., not a sum of its elements. (Moon 1998: 4). Viggo Hjørnager Pedersen recognizes that some linguists define all stock-phrases and habitual collocations as idioms, while others require them to be non-transparent (e.g., “once in a blue moon”), thus omitting phrases like “that’s the way it is” (Pedersen Hjørnager 1997: 109).

3.1 Phraseological Units (PUs)

The term phraseological units (PUs) stands out when discussing multi-word expressions. It can be used as an umbrella term that encompasses pure idioms, similes, proverbs, sayings, quotations and similar units of language (Omazić 2015: 18). Ginzburg et al. (1979) use the term phraseological unit to denote “non-motivated word-groups that cannot be freely made up in speech but are reproduced as ready-made units” (Ginzburg 1979: 74). Their main features are lexical stability and lack of motivation. Viktor Vinogradov classified PUs based on their degree of idiomaticity into: “phraseological fusions”, “phraseological unities” and “phraseological collocations” (Ginzburg 1979: 75-76). Phraseological fusion are non-motivated and lexically stable items, e.g., “red tape” and “kick the bucket”, while phraseological unities are also non-motivated, but metaphorical in nature, like “to show one’s teeth” (Ginzburg 1979: 75-76). Lastly, phraseological collocations have a certain degree of lexical valency that gives the multi-word structure stability. For instance, “bear a grudge” can be modified into “bear malice”, but not into “bear a fancy” (Ginzburg 1979: 76). The leading international classification of phraseological units into idioms, collocations and proverbs is influenced by Vinogradov’s division (Burger 2007: 13). Idioms correspond to Vinogradov’s first two classes, while collocations parallel the third class. All definitions of PUs share the idea that the main feature of these word groups is an unmotivated stability of lexical components. Often the boundaries between phraseological units and other multi-word units of language remain unclear, and it is both impossible and undesirable to make a clear-cut and extensive terminological classification of the subject area, as many items can be classified into several different groups.

For the scope of this study, a broad definition of phraseological units proposed by Marija Omazić in her monography Phraseology Through the Looking Glass (2015) will be used. This definition is chosen because it covers a wide range of PUs that are found in The American Heritage Dictionary of Idioms (1997) which encompasses units that were used in Poe’s time, as well as contemporary dictionaries, i.e., The Farlex Idioms and Slang Dictionary (2017) and the online The Free Dictionary (<http://idioms.thefreedictionary.com>), which prove their contemporary relevance. Omazić defines phraseological units as “conventionalized multiword combinations that are holistically stored and automatically reproduced, and that may vary in frequency of occurrence, fixedness of form and compositeness of meaning” (Omazić 2015: 20). Furthermore, Omazić’s research conducted using this definition highlights the stylistic value of the native-like idiomaticity of PUs and the importance in keeping these structures during their translation because omitting or changing the degree of idiomaticity in the translation leads to a significant loss of stylistic and connotative potential.

4. Translating PUs: Difficulties

Phraseological units are not easily defined, identified and categorized, and it is often even more difficult to transfer the accurate meaning of the phraseological unit into a foreign language. Recognizing idiomatic PUs can be difficult, so translators must pay close attention to the context in which a multi-word expression occurs or consult specialized dictionaries of phraseological units. When PUs are successfully identified, the next step would be to find appropriate PUs in the target language that carry the same or similar meaning, i.e. which would maintain the same level of idiomaticity of the ST in the TT. Sustaining idiomaticity is a challenging, but important task, since idiomaticity builds a vital part of the stylistic expressiveness of a text.

4.1 Identification

Before the translation process of phraseological units can begin, it is necessary to identify them. While opaque phrases and PUs that stand out in a given context are easy to identify — this may not always be the case. PUs may be misleading as they might appear transparent on the surface or might be understood literally, with context providing little to no clues about their idiomatic nature, as might be the case with the item “take someone for a ride” (Baker 1992: 66). Authors may even use both the literal and figurative meaning of a phraseological unit for stylistic effect. Furthermore, an idiomatic expression in the target language may appear similar to a source text phraseological unit on the surface, but might have a different or partially different meaning in the TL. For instance, “Has a cat got your tongue?” is an idiomatic expression urging a person to answer a question, which has a similar French counterpart “donner sa langue au chat” (lit. ‘to give one’s tongue to the cat’), but the French phrase means to “give up”, for example, when answering a riddle (Baker 1992: 67). It is, therefore, crucial to pay close attention to the context of PUs in order to correctly observe their meaning and avoid mistranslations. This is where translators ought to resort to specialized dictionaries of phraseological units, which provide further information about the meaning of a unit and its appropriate context.

4.2 Idiomaticity

Viggo Hjørnager Pedersen touches upon the complexity of translating idiomatic expressions and the difficulty of achieving equivalence in the target language translations. He emphasizes the common understanding that the main difficulty of translating idioms is that they lack an equivalent in a target language, but believes that this does not pose a problem, since idiomatic expressions can be replaced by an unidiomatic expression or single lexeme (Pedersen Hjørnager 1997: 109). However, he states that continually embracing this solution in the same text can make the translation “flatter” than the original. In the article A Model of Idiomaticity, Beatrice Warren argues that idiomaticity makes a text more nativelike, since it “consists in knowing what situations and phenomena require standard expression”, despite other grammatically correct language solutions that the speakers are aware of, but instinctively prefer the idiomatic options (Warren 2005: 36). Non-native speakers have problems because they may form grammatically correct sentences that are not used by native speakers (Warren 2005: 39). Knowledge of this combinatory potential of words, i.e., knowing which multi-word expressions are more conventional among other options is important for maintaining the same degree of idiomaticity in translations (Warren 2005: 40). Research findings indicate a definite decrease of idiomaticity during this transfer, i.e., the idiomaticity of the source text PUs is lost or decreased during the translation process (Omazić 2015: 132) Yet, changing this level of idiomaticity during the translation process leads to a significant change of the stylistic and connotative potential of the source text, which ought to be avoided.

4.3 Style

Viggo Hjørnager Pedersen believes that the translation of idioms is both difficult and necessary, since they give a text a distinct “flavour”, and the text would be impoverished by their absence (Pedersen Hjørnager 1997: 109). On the other hand, the first impulse to select an item that appears to be a full idiomatic match on the surface, without closely considering the particular context, register, style or the target culture, also has its drawbacks (Omazić 2015: 134). Translators may try to paraphrase a phraseological unit to avoid such misunderstandings, but this depletes the target text of the original stylistic expressiveness and connotative potential of the ST phraseological unit (Omazić 2015: 135). This emotive and pragmatic function of PUs is an important stylistic characteristic of the ST, which is lost in a translation that primarily relies on paraphrasing rather than phraseological units. This is why translators may opt to compensate the loss of idiomaticity in the TT by rendering a unit that was not originally a phraseological unit in the ST as a phraseological unit in the TT. Compensating the idiomaticity to preserve emotive force of the original prevents the loss of style and register that occur because of the loss of phraseology in the TT (Omazić 2015: 142). However, this compensation is usually not carried out, leaving the translations depleted of a vital phraseological layer of the figurative ST. This is why a general pre-assessment of the ST should be carried out before a translation to properly assess the phraseological saturation of the ST, which should be maintained in the translation (Omazić 2015: 143). Omazić advises translators to adhere to the idiomaticity of the ST or compensate the left out idiomatic elements elsewhere in the text, rather than simply using literalization strategies in the form of paraphrase and transcoding or deletion strategies by means of omission.

5. Translating PUs: Strategies

Due to the various difficulties that arise during the translation process of phraseological units, linguistic and translation scholars have attempted to compile strategies as guidelines for translating idioms and other fixed expressions. The Western European contrastive approach to the translation of phraseological units became more prominent during the late 20th century with the works by Eckhard Roos (1981), Mona Baker (1992), Bo Svensén (1993), Henrik Gottlieb (1997) and Peter Newmark (1998). The theory and strategies for the translation of idioms and other fixed expressions proposed by these scholars were compiled and expanded by Marija Omazić in her monography Phraseology Through the Looking Glass (2015). Omazić's monography also includes an extensive contrastive study of the translation of phraseological units from contemporary English-language novels and movies into Croatian.

5.1 Eckhard Roos (1981)

Eckhard Roos was one of the first Western European linguists who discussed the issue of translating idiomatic units from a contrastive point of view. He made a contrastive equivalence analysis of English and German idioms and recognized that SL items can be translated by means of idioms, single words or non-idiomatic formulae (Roos 1981: 232). Roos distinguishes between two different forms of idiomatic matches: a) idioms which have the same meaning, use the same lexical material and cover the same denotations, and b) idioms which are equivalent in meaning but use different lexical material (Roos 1981: 232). The first form presents instances of congruence, i.e., SL and TL idioms which are at the same word level, and while they might not be equivalent at the semantic level, they share a formal correspondence. Congruence is common among European languages due to the shared culture and tradition of the nations. For instance, the English “old flame” and the German “alte Flamme” are examples of this congruence (Roos 1981: 233). The literal translation of “alte Flamme” would directly correspond to its English counterpart.

The second form represents what Roos calls “equivalence”, and it occurs when idioms have a semantic match, but remain different at the word-level. For instance, various culture-specific idiomatic items in English and German convey the same meaning but express it by means of different lexical material. Lexical items in this subgroup differ on a scale of gradience. The lexical items used to express the same meaning can either be similar or entirely different. An example of this would be the idiomatic expression “didn’t lift a finger” which has a similar German counterpart “keinen Finger krumm machen” [lit. make no finger crooked]. The meaning of the idiomatic expression is the same and they share a similar metaphoric setting of the “finger”, but the motion of the finger is different in the languages (Roos 1981: 233). The English idiomatic expression “to read the riot act” and the German “jemandem die Leviten lesen” both share the meaning “to chastise, or issue a warning”, but the German idiom uses a Biblical metaphor [lit. to read the Book of Levites to someone].

Roos recognizes three ways SL idioms are matched by other TL lexemes: single word units, formulae and free forms. Idioms can be translated by non-idiomatic units because of “synthetic expression”, i.e., an idiom of the ST can be expressed “analytically” through other lexical means in the TT (Roos 1981: 233). For instance, “by the way” can be expressed by a single lexeme “übrigens” in German, and “to sit by the fence” may be worded as a fixed non-idiomatic group “mit der Sache nichts zu tun haben” (lit. “to have nothing to do with something”) (Roos 1981: 233-234). Lastly, sometimes the only way of conveying the meaning of an idiomatic expression is by means of free form, i.e., paraphrase. The idioms “to shoot for the moon” and “blind date” have no fixed multi-word matches in German, so their meanings have to be paraphrased. Their translations are descriptive, seemingly like a definition of the English idioms. Roos concludes that there are only a few cases where complete equivalence can be achieved. Even with congruence, it is still likely that PUs have a different connotational meaning or stylistic effect, and there might even be deviations in the pragmatic usage of the idiomatic units (Roos 1981: 236-237). Roos’ categorization can be represented as follows:

- a) Congruence – semantic equivalence + formal correspondence (SL idioms = TL idioms)
- b) Equivalence – semantic equivalence + other lexical units (SL idioms → other TL lexemes)
 - a. Single words
 - b. Formulae
 - c. Free Forms

5.2 Mona Baker (1992)

Mona Baker presents five strategies for translating idioms, which are applicable to the translation of phraseological units (Baker 1992: 72-78):

a) Using an idiom of similar meaning and form

Translators instinctively try to find a perfect match for an idiomatic expression, a match that would share the same meaning and lexical material as the source text phraseological unit. However, it is important that the presence and degree of idiomaticity is appropriate in that particular register of the TT, as well as meet the rhetoric and stylistic needs of the TL audience (Baker 1992: 72). An example of this strategy is the Croatian “biti (živjeti) u čijoj sjeni”, which has a perfect English idiomatic equivalent “be/live in someone’s shadow”. This strategy corresponds to Eckhard Roos’ definition of congruence.

b) Using an idiom of similar meaning but dissimilar form

Sometimes idiomatic expressions lack a perfect match in the TL, but there are often units in the TL that express a similar meaning by different lexical means (Baker 1992: 74). In this case, the metaphor is roughly the same, but has a different form. For instance, while in Croatian you can say “napiti se kao deva” (lit. “get as drunk as a camel”), English speakers use “<as> drunk as a(n) fish/skunk/pig/owl” or even “as drunk as a lord” (Hrvatsko-engleski frazeološki rječnik 2008: 149). While all those idiomatic expressions share the metaphorical image of an animal to describe the state of being very intoxicated, the actual lexical units (animals) that are used to illustrate this state are different.

c) Translation by paraphrase

Translation by paraphrase is the most frequently used strategy, used when there is no idiomatic match in the TL or where idiomaticity is stylistically inappropriate in the TL (Baker 1992: 74). Paraphrase may appear as a single lexeme or have the form of other non-fixed structures of the TL.

d) Translation by omission

The idiomatic expression may be omitted altogether, usually when there is no appropriate match in the TL. Omission is also used when the meaning cannot be easily paraphrased, or for simply stylistic reasons (Baker 1992: 77).

e) Compensation

When an idiomatic expression cannot be accurately translated with an idiomatic expression or when a particular context does not allow idiomatic translation, the translator may compensate the lack of idiomaticity at another point of the TT, in a segment that did not display idiomaticity in the ST (Baker 1992: 78). This strategy may be used to keep a similar degree of idiomaticity between the source and target text.

5.3 Bo Svensén (1993)

Bo Svensén believes that it is imperative that idioms from the source text are paralleled in the target language by idioms that share the same meaning (Svensén 1993: 156). He urges translators to maintain the same level of idiomatic saturation of the ST in their translations, and advises them to, because of their deceptive nature, familiarize themselves with the exact meaning of an idiomatic expression. The transferred meaning of the SL metaphor often has a similar metaphoric counterpart in the TL, and while Svensén recognizes that there are idioms without a metaphoric counterpart, he provides no strategies for such instances. Therefore, his strategies, are not really helpful when translating challenging idiomatic expressions, but can be viewed as an extended categorization of idiomatic phraseological units. They are based upon the equivalence of metaphorical transferred meanings of idioms in the source and target language:

- 1) Same metaphors – identical metaphors in the SL and TL; corresponds to Roos's congruence
- 2) Related metaphors – the metaphors are roughly the same
- 3) Unlike metaphors – different metaphor in the TL (e.g., “beat about the bush” vs. “herumgehen wie die Katze um den heißen Brei” („lit. to go around like a cat around hot porridge“))
- 4) No corresponding metaphors – TL translation = paraphrase of the meaning of the SL idiom

(Svensén 1993: 156-157)

5.4 Henrik Gottlieb (1997)

Gottlieb recognizes that there is a “conceptual paradox” – idiomaticity sometimes requires that idioms should not be translated with idioms (Gottlieb 1997: 318). He believes that the compulsory idiom-to-idiom translation is only necessary in transfer, but not in “idiomatic transmutation” (Gottlieb 1997: 318). The strategies he proposes are congruence, equivalence, correspondence, reduction, paraphrase, expansion and omission (Gottlieb 1997 319-320). Congruence corresponds to Eckhard Roos' congruence, i.e., semantic and formal correspondence. On the other hand, Gottlieb's equivalence covers the same units as Baker's second strategy: b) using an idiom of similar meaning but dissimilar form. Reduction, paraphrase and expansion all express non-idiomatic renderings of ST idiomatic units by means of a single word, phrase or expanded wordings. These three strategies are comparative to Roos' categories of non-idiomatic renderings by means of single words, formulae and free forms. Lastly, Gottlieb's omission and compensation correspond to Baker's categories with the same name. Therefore, Gottlieb's categorization may be viewed as a synthesis of the strategies by Eckhard Roos, Bo Svensén and Mona Baker. Gottlieb's strategies are presented in Table 1.

Table 1 Gottlieb's translation strategies

STRATEGY	PROCESS	CATEGORY
Congruence	SL idiom > identical TL idiom	Idioms rendered metaphorically
Equivalence	SL idiom > similar TL idiom	Idioms rendered metaphorically
Correspondence	SL idiom > different TL idiom	Idioms rendered metaphorically
Reduction	SL idiom > TL word	Idioms rendered non-metaphorically
Paraphrase	SL idiom > TL phrase	Idioms rendered non-metaphorically
Expansion	SL idiom > TL circumlocution	Idioms rendered non-metaphorically
Omission	SL idiom > 0 (void)	Idioms being omitted
Compensation	SL non-idiom > TL idiom	Non-idioms rendered metaphorically

Gottlieb adds a subcategorization in which he regroups similar strategies together:

- Adherence (1, 2, 3): idioms rendered metaphorically
- Literalization (4, 5, 6): idioms rendered non-metaphorically

- Deletion (7): idioms being omitted
- Idiomatization (8): non-idioms rendered metaphorically

(Gottlieb 1997: 320)

5.5 Peter Newmark (1998)

Peter Newmark offers only brief strategies for translating idioms:

- a) Finding another metaphor in the TL
- b) Reducing the sense of the SL idiom in the TL = loss of emotive force
- c) Literal translation – where necessary

(Newmark 1998: 40)

Finding another metaphor in the TL corresponds to Gottlieb's category of adherence (idioms rendered metaphorically), while reducing the sense of the SL idiom may be viewed as a form of Gottlieb's literalization (idioms rendered non-metaphorically). However, Newmark proposes a new strategy for translating idiomatic expressions: literal translation. This is a strategy that translators try to avoid, due to the fact that literal translation of certain metaphoric units may result in non-transparent meanings in the TL. Some metaphors may be transparent in different languages, but others may not. However, this strategy can frequently be observed in translations and results in non-idiomatic renderings that may successfully transfer the meaning of the SL unit. With time, these idiomatic units may indeed become fixed units in the TL. Later categorizations, like that of Omazić (2015) name this strategy "transcoding".

5.6 Marija Omazić (2015)

Marija Omazić presents strategies for translating phraseological units which can be viewed as a synthesis of the findings of Eckhard Roos (1981), Mona Baker (1992), Bo Svensén (1993), Henrik Gottlieb (1997) and Peter Newmark (1998). These strategies are based upon the findings of a PU translation study based on Croatian translations of contemporary British and American novels and movies (Omazić 2015: 141). Omazić's PU translation strategies comprise of: full idiomatic match, partial idiomatic match, unrelated idiomatic match, paraphrase, transcoding, mistranslation, omission and addition. Full idiomatic match, partial idiomatic match and unrelated idiomatic match may be categorized under Gottlieb's subcategory of adherence, while paraphrase and transcoding coincide with literalization. Furthermore, omission is equivalent to deletion and addition to idiomatization. Omazić introduces the new category of mistranslation. While mistranslation might not necessarily be a translation strategy, since it covers instances of wrongly, inaccurately or inappropriately translated PUs, the analysis of its presence is vital for a contrastive study. The conclusion of Omazić's study of PU translations is that the right degree of idiomaticity must be achieved in the TT to enhance the readability of the text. Omazić's complete typology is presented in Table 2.

Table 2 Omazić's translation strategies

STRATEGY	EXPLANATION	EXAMPLES
Full idiomatic match	Translation by a PU with identical form and meaning	She thinks it'll break his heart if he finds out = Slomit će mu srce ako dozna
Partial idiomatic match	Translation by a partial lexically and/or structurally equivalent PU	Shrek! Fiona! Aren't you two a sight for sore eyes! = Shrek! Fiona! E, jeste melem za moje oči!
Unrelated idiomatic match	Idiomatic translation by a lexically and formally unrelated PU	We lost our touch , bro = Ispali smo iz štos a, buraz. Missed me, now you gotta kiss me! = Ulovi me, ulovi me, kupit ću ti novine! Ready or not, here I come! = Tko se nije skrio, magarac je bio!
Paraphrase	Translation by a non-idiomatic paraphrase or single lexeme	I see someone else who has a bun in the oven! = A vidim, još mi je netko trudan malo. That's just the tip of the iceberg! = No to nije sve! Keep your mouth shut! = Šuti!
Transcoding	Non-idiomatic but transparent word-for-word translation	Because I think your fiancé may have a few skeletons in his closet that he is not telling you about

		= Mislim da ti zaručnik ima par kostura u ormaru Heaven knows she's got enough on her plate without having to worry about a shop full of bloomin' old pop records. = Nebo zna da je dovoljno toga na tanjuru i bez uzrujavanja oko trgovine pune vražjih starih pop ploča...
Mistranslation	Incorrect translation: wrong PU or paraphrase; non-standard expression; non-transparent word-for-word translation	My friend Clara is coming, and she hasn't got a chap, and she's right up your street. = Doći će moja prijateljica Clara, a ona nema dečka, a ona je baš za tvoju ulicu. This, really, is the bottom line, the chief attraction of the opposite sex for all of us... = Ovo je, zbilja, donja granica, glavni razlog privlačnosti suprotnog spola svima nama...
Omission	Accidental or intentional omission	To say the least, I don't like what I'm seeing from these Fockers. = Ne sviđa mi se što vidim.
Addition	Intentional addition of PUs not present in the ST to compensate for omissions and match the style and figurative saturation of the ST	I promise, I will never let anything happen to you. = Obećajem da ću te čuvati kao zjenicu oka svog. Story time's over. = Čiča miča, gotova je priča. He stood on the shore of uncertainty and drove right in. = Išao je k'o mačak oko vruće kaše i onda hopla.

For the scope of this study, a slightly modified version of Omazić's translation strategies was used to group the PUs, since this categorization most accurately depicts the PUs present in Poe's short stories, whereas a modified version of Gottlieb's subcategorization was used to bring together similar translation strategies according to the degree of idiomaticity being preserved in them.

6. Retranslation Hypothesis (RH)

The term retranslation “denotes a second or later translation of a single source text into the same target language” (Koskinen 2010: 294). Retranslation usually occurs over an extended period of time, and the most frequently retranslated works of literature are classics. Since retranslations involve the same source and target language, the crucial variable that changes is time. This is why retranslations can be used to study “changing translation norms and strategies, the standardization of language, or the effects of the political or cultural context” (Koskinen 2010: 295). The study of retranslations offers many benefits to the contrastive study of language, since it highlights both the differences between the SL and TL, as well as the changes that occur within the TL with time. Retranslation is an old practice, but it had long been a marginal subject in translation studies. With time, however, translation scholars started inquiring more about whether retranslations share some universal characteristics. The rise in scholarly interest in retranslation can be traced back to the publication of the special issue of the French journal Palimpsestes (1990) dedicated to the phenomenon of retranslation and edited by Antoine Berman and Paul Bensimon. In this pioneering study of retranslation, Berman and Bensimon formulated the basis of what is now called the retranslation hypothesis (RH). The term was later defined by Chesterman (2000) and motivated empirical research trying to either prove, amplify or dispute the retranslation hypothesis (Cadera 2016: 6).

In the preface to the special edition of *Palimpsestes*¹, Paul Bensimon addressed the differences between first translations and retranslations, claiming that first translations are more domesticating than the subsequent retranslations (Bensimon 1990: ix, cited in Paloposki 2004: 27). He claimed that the first translations were assimilating because they had an introductory function in the target culture, making the initial reception of the work more positive, avoiding the possible rejection of the foreign elements. Bensimon believed that the later translations have more freedom, i.e., they need not be bound to the constraints of the target culture and can, therefore, maintain a cultural distance and correct the shortcomings of previous translations. This gives retranslations a restorative function. Retranslations can also reveal historical, cultural and social changes in the target culture, and showcase the preferences in aesthetics and translation strategies of a certain period of time (Cadera 2016: 14). Antoine Berman² continued Bensimon's discussion by adding that there is a need for retranslations because first translations date, which leads to a need for new translations of the same work (Berman 1990: 1-7), cited in Paloposki 2004: 27). Berman believed that first translations cannot be great translations because first translations will always have shortcomings, so they will always be paving the way for later retranslations (Koskinen 2010: 295). Essentially, retranslation occurs because the previous translations do not meet all the requirements of the receiving culture and because every generation has a different idea of a good and functional translation.

6.1 Validity and Implementation

The main idea behind the retranslation hypothesis is that first translations deviate more from the ST, and are accordingly more TL- oriented, i.e., adapted to the norms of the TL audience, since they determine whether the text will be accepted in the TL culture (Desmidt 2009: 671). When the audience becomes more familiar with the TL and culture, the TL culture starts to allow, even demands retranslations that present the ST closer to its original form. The retranslations have the advantage of taking a critical stance to the previous translations in an effort to improve them. It is believed that translation norms often become less rigid with time, and allow for a closer rendition of the earlier translation (Desmidt 2009: 678). This idea that translations develop from a TL-oriented to ST-oriented approach can be traced back to Goethe, who believed that the highest stage of translation would be a translation identical to the original (Desmidt 2009: 671).

Text types also play an important role in the translation process. For instance, children's literature often displays a reverse trend to the retranslation hypothesis, as it is usually more ST-oriented in the first translation, while rewrites are more TL-oriented, with many deletions. The study of the Swedish retranslations of the German children's book Nils Holgersson can be used as an example of this tendency (Desmidt 2009: 677). Since the sixties and seventies, the main pedagogic approach in the West was to make children's literature more 'readable', causing many deletions of unnecessary elements. The text types and genre expectations of the target text culture, thus play an important role in the retranslation process.

² Berman, Antoine. 1990. "La retraduction comme espace de la traduction". Palimpsestes XIII (4): 1-7.

Many translations indeed follow the patterns of the retranslation hypothesis, because it is logical that a text that appears to be extremely foreign to the target culture requires a certain degree of domestication in order to be accepted in a different cultural setting, and later translations are less bound by these constraints due to the increased familiarity of the target audience with the subject that grows with time (Paloposki 2004: 28). However, even though the RH can be observed in many translations, it is not the norm. It may be turned around, making the first translations more foreignizing and retranslations more domesticating. This is because the TT readers may be familiar with the SL culture elements by means other than the first translation. The translator may even keep the foreign elements in the first translation and address them in the preface of the translation (Paloposki 2004: 36). Furthermore, it must be noted that the retranslations analyzed in Palimpsestes are older translations. Berman discusses the translations of the Bible, Vergil and Plutarch, and he stresses that time is only ripe for “big translations” (grandes traductions), i.e., translations that never date (Desmidt 2009: 678). This means that time span also plays a vital role when testing the retranslation hypothesis, but Berman does not precisely determine this necessary time span.

The retranslation hypothesis is not enough to explain all the causes of retranslation and there are other factors that influence the textual profile of retranslations. There are also entities within the literarily system, which have an impact on the way literature is rewritten, such as critics, rewriters, teachers and translators (Lefevere 1992: 14). These entities will influence the process of rewriting a work of literature, until it fits the dominant poetics and ideology of a specific time and place. Once a title and author are accepted into the canon, the publication process becomes easier, leading to a higher chance of retranslations being published. It must also be noted that publishers may require retranslations when they deem them profitable, for instance, because of anniversaries, literary awards, new considerations of a particular author, or the retranslation process may be motivated by social, historical, cultural or political changes that occurred in the target culture (Cadera 2016: 14). Works of literature may have different interpretations and sometimes the profile of the translation is determined by the individual style of the translators. The concise form pressure may also be caused by economic factors, namely printing costs that might be reduced by a shorter version of a retranslation. It may as well be that the definition of an accurate translation changes with time and a narrow-minded belief that a newer translation is superior to its predecessors is a questionable because it equates quality with linear progression (Paloposki 2004:

36). The retranslation hypothesis may therefore be valid to a certain degree, but only if it is not formulated through absolute terms and is reexamined through different text types and genres to account for various intratextual and extratextual factors that influence the translation process. (Desmidt 2009: 679). Recent studies have been conducted to try to test the applicability of the retranslation hypothesis. In the seventh issue of the Croatian journal of translation studies Hieronymus, the RH proved to be valid for the Croatian (re)translation of William Faulkner's The Sound and the Fury, while the retranslation of James Joyce's Ulysses demonstrated contradictory findings, since the retranslation hypothesis did not sufficiently explain the phenomenon of (re)translation in the latter instance (Vraneković 2021, Mesić 2021).

7. Objectives of the study

This study presents a contrastive analysis of the Croatian translations of the phraseological units in Edgar Allan Poe's The Black Cat (1843) and The Murders in the Rue Morgue (1841). For this purpose, three Croatian translations of both short stories published during different periods of the development of the Croatian language were used, namely, the translations by Tin Ujević (1952), Nada Šoljan (1974) and Saša Drach (2008). The study will compare which translation strategies and subcategories of translation strategies were most frequently used during the translation process from English into Croatian by different translators during different time periods, and it will be observed how the translations and the frequency of the strategies change with time, as well as how the idiomaticity changes with each translation.

The objective of this study is to test the retranslation hypothesis on the translated phraseological units by means of determining whether the idiomaticity of the ST was maintained in the translations through adherence and compensation strategies, or lost by means of literalization and deletion strategies. In accordance with the RH the PUs in the first translations ought to be domesticating (TT- oriented), i.e., idiomaticity will be lost, and the retranslations should be foreignizing (ST-oriented), with a higher frequency of idiomatic units being preserved.

These objectives will also serve as a guideline to explore the validity of following hypotheses:

H1: Retranslations of Edgar Allan Poe's The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue into Croatian will be more ST-oriented by using more adherence strategies than the TT-oriented first translations

H2: First translations of Edgar Allan Poe's The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue into Croatian will be more TT-oriented by using more literalization and deletion strategies than the ST-oriented retranslations

8. Methodology

The study includes two ST and six TTs. The source texts are Edgar Allan Poe's short stories The Black Cat (1843) and The Murders in the Rue Morgue (1841). Both short stories were translated into Croatian by Tin Ujević, Nada Šoljan and Saša Drach, respectively. Tin Ujević's translations were published in 1952 as part of a compilation of Poe's short stories Crni mačak i druge grozne priče by the publishing house "Zora". Nada Šoljan's translations were published in 1974 as part of the compilation Crni mačak by "Školska knjiga", while the most recent translations were made by Saša Drach in 2008 as part of the compilation Maska crvene smrti i druge strašne priče by "Europapress holding". This is a unique corpus, since not many literary texts were translated from English into Croatian in the second half of the 20th century. The main reason behind this trend are the historical events, i.e., the aftermath of the Second World War, which led to a sudden isolation of Croatia, which had then been part of Yugoslavia, from the West and anglophone products. The intercultural exchange with the anglophone world had increased at the end of the 1950s and the beginning of the 1960s, but this process was slow and under supervision of the state (Veselica Majhut 2020: 114). These historical and political changes had an impact on the publishing activity of English language literature, i.e., on translations and retranslations. Translations from English into Croatian were limited to canonical works, and in the sixties, there were only few literary translations from English into Croatian. Finding a translation of Poe's work published by "Zora" with the adjective "Croatian" in the publishing company description ("Državno izdavačko poduzeće Hrvatska") presents a unique opportunity to analyze this early phase of the first translation of Poe's work into Croatian. Furthermore, finding a translation that was directly translated from English into Croatian in the late 1950s (as is the case with Tin Ujević's translation) was a difficult task, because most translations from that period were indirect translation from other languages. It is not often that two short stories by the same author have been translated into the same language three times by three different sets of translators in a time span of 56 years, making this an excellent opportunity for gaining insight into a unique corpus and the way translation practices of PUs have changed over time. The study will demonstrate the most frequently used strategies grouped according to similar types, and the way in which idiomaticity changes with each new translation, as well as explore the validity of the retranslation hypothesis in these (re)translations. The six translations of Poe's short stories are a great source of phraseological units, and build a corpus which should accurately portray the level of density and variety of phraseological units in Poe's work. However, it must be noted that the size of the corpus is limited, and thus definite conclusions about the way phraseological units are represented in the work of Edgar Allan Poe or, in fact, any other literary text cannot be made. The research is exploratory and should motivate further research.

Within the scope of this study, phraseological units were first extracted following Marija Omazić's definition of phraseological units in the source texts, and then by their presence in three source language specialized dictionaries: The American Heritage Dictionary of Idioms (1997), The Farlex Idioms and Slang Dictionary (2017) and the online version of the Farlex Idioms Dictionary The Free Dictionary (<https://idioms.thefreedictionary.com>). The usage of The American Heritage Dictionary of Idioms was vital for the identification of older phraseological units from the short stories published in 1840s, while the newer dictionaries serve as a validation of the synchronic relevance of these units. On the other hand, the TT PUs were identified based on their presence in the Croatian phraseological dictionary Hrvatski frazeološki rječnik (2014) and the online database Baza frazema hrvatskoga jezika (<http://frazemi.ihjj.hr>). The phraseological units of both languages and their equivalent units were also compared to the suggested translations in the Croatian-English phraseological dictionary Hrvatsko-engleski frazeološki rječnik (2008).

Each PU occurrence was counted separately, so as to determine their frequency in the STs and TTs. The translations of PUs were then categorized according to a modified version of Omazić's strategies for the translations of PUs. Omazić's categorization was chosen because it synthesizes the translation strategies by Eckhard Roos (1981), Mona Baker (1992), Bo Svensén (1993), Henrik Gottlieb (1997) and Peter Newmark (1998). Furthermore, Omazić's categorization covers most PU occurrences in the TTs. The typology used in the study was then subcategorized according to a slightly modified version of Gottlieb’s subcategories of adherence, literalization, deletion and idiomatization, with idiomatization being renamed into compensation. One instance of mistranslation was recognized in the translation and was added together with literalization and deletion, as it can be recognized as an instance of idiomaticity being lost. Gottlieb’s subcategorization was chosen because it groups similar translation strategies, and it will be used to determine the degree to which a translation is ST-oriented (adherence, compensation) or TT oriented (literalization, deletion). When the units were successfully categorized and subcategorized, they were quantitatively analyzed in an effort to determine the frequency of translation strategies in the TTs.

8.1 Translating PUs: Consolidated strategies

Marija Omazić’s strategies for translating phraseological units are: full idiomatic match (FIM), partial idiomatic match (PIM), unrelated idiomatic match (UIM), paraphrase (P), transcoding (T), mistranslation (M) and addition (A). The category of addition was analyzed at the sentence-level to determine the relative level of compensation of ST elements which were not rendered as PUs in the ST. As a result, new strategies were added to Omazić’s categorization to account for instances of paraphrase/addition (P/A), transcoding/addition (T/A) and unrelated match /addition (UM/A). Addition was introduced to cover PUs present in another place in the TT that was non-idiomatic in the ST. Gottlieb’s subcategory idiomatization was modified into compensation (C) to more accurately label the insertion of PU elements in the TT. The newly added categories are highlighted with an asterisk (*). The resulting categorization of PUs that will be used in this study is presented in Table 3.

The phraseological units were subcategorized according to a modified version of Gottlieb's subcategorization into: adherence, literalization and deletion. New categories were added in order to cover all PUs present in the TT: compensation and mistranslation. The newly added subcategories are highlighted with an asterisk (*).

- Adherence: phraseological units rendered with other phraseological units (full idiomatic match, partial idiomatic match, unrelated idiomatic match, paraphrase + unrelated idiomatic match)
- Literalization: phraseological rendered with non-phraseological units (paraphrase, transcoding)
- Deletion: omitted phraseological units (omission)
- Compensation: phraseological units rendered with (non)phraseological units, with a PU compensation elsewhere in the sentence, (paraphrase/addition, transcoding/addition, unrelated idiomatic match/addition), inspired by Gottlieb's category of idiomatization
- Mistranslation: mistakes in the rendering of idiomatic units that lead to a loss of idiomaticity

9. Results

The results of the quantitative study are presented, first as an overview of the translation strategies recognized in the STs for both short stories, then grouped according to a modified version of Gottlieb's subcategorization for both short stories, and finally individually for each short story and translator. The subcategories include categories in which the original idiomaticity of the STs was maintained (ST-oriented approach – adherence and compensation), and those in which an idiomaticity-loss was recognized (TT-oriented approach – literalization and deletion). The single instance of mistranslation was counted among instances of idiomaticity-loss, but cannot be viewed as a TT-oriented approach due to its erroneous nature.

Combined, 238 phraseological units were identified in the source texts, 56 in The Black Cat and 182 in The Murders in the Rue Morgue. Paraphrase is the predominant translation strategy in both source text, which was, interestingly, used the same number of times in both source text, with an exception being Nada Šoljan's translation of The Murders in Rue Morgue, which had eight instances fewer than its counterparts. The second most frequently used strategy in The Black Cat was unrelated idiomatic match, which can be contributed to its frequent use in Tin Ujević's translation. The third most frequently used strategy in The Black Cat was the word-for-word strategy transcoding, closely followed by the adherence strategy partial idiomatic match and the compensation strategy paraphrase/addition. In The Black Cat, only Saša Drach's translation from 2008 had omissions, as well as the only instance of mistranslation in both STs. Full idiomatic match was an unfavored strategy in The Black Cat, with only one occurrence in Tin Ujević's translation and two and three occurrences in Šoljan and Drach's translation, respectively. The distribution of translation strategies in The Murders in Rue Morgue was somewhat different. Nada Šoljan's translation used paraphrase less than its counterparts and Šoljan's translation had the highest frequency of full, partial and unrelated idiomatic matches. Tin Ujević's translation had a standout rate of transcoding, while the newest translation by Saša Drach had a significantly higher rate of omissions.

The newest translation also has one instance of mistranslation, where the translator misinterpreted the meaning of a PU. The mistranslation of the phraseological unit “by the bye” [by the by], meaning “incidentally, in the passing” by translating it as “doviđenja” (“goodbye”) is presented in Table 6.

Table 6 Mistranslation in The Black Cat

PU	Meaning	Sentence	Saša Drach (2008)
by the bye	Incidentally, in passing	By the bye , gentlemen, this — this is a very well constructed house. (113)	Do videnja gospodo. A ovo, ovo je vrlo dobro sagrađena kuća. (148)

While the context of the sentence may suggest the PU is a farewell greeting because of the contemporary usage of the word “bye”, it is clear that the phraseological unit is meant to be interpreted as “incidentally, in passing”, signaled by the repetition of “this” in the ST sentence. Tin Ujević’s and Nada Šoljan’s translations have both successfully transferred the meaning of the ST unit with “mimogred rečeno” and “uzgred rečeno”. This mistranslation is a perfect example of a misleading idiomatic phraseological unit, where context and consulting of a specialized dictionary should have been considered. “By the bye” can also appear as “by the by” and such a form might have been less misleading in this particular context, as the double prepositional composition would signal its idiomatic nature. The “by[e]” originally denoted "a side path", hence the meaning of "off the track" or "of secondary importance"(American Heritage Dictionary 1997: 156-157).

9.2 Subcategories

After the initial PU analysis, the translation strategies were subdivided according to a modified version of Gottlieb’s subcategorization. This analysis is important because it groups similar translation strategies into cohesive groups: adherence, literalization, deletion and compensation. Mistranslation will also be a part of this subcategorization, despite the fact that it does not form an actual translation strategy per se, but it is still important for analyzing the idiomaticity-loss in the translations. This categorization will be used to determine to what degree the idiomaticity of the ST is matched in the TT (re)translations. Adherence includes all instances of full, partial and unrelated idiomatic matches (FIM, PIM and UIM), but also cases where the units were merged by means of paraphrase and an unrelated idiomatic match into one entity to establish the same meaning as the ST idiomatic unit (P+UIM). Compensation, where the loss of idiomaticity of the ST was amended elsewhere in the TT sentence, includes instances where literalized units of paraphrase and transcoding restore their original idiomaticity through originally non-idiomatic units being rendered as such (P/A, T/A). Combined, adherence and compensation maintain the original idiomaticity of the ST in the TTs, making them more ST-oriented. On the other hand, literalization includes instances of idiomaticity being lost because phraseological units were paraphrased or rendered by a word-for-word translation (P, T). Deletion covers all instances where the original phraseological units are completely omitted (O) in the TT- translations. Literalization and deletion, together with mistranslation, highlight instances where the original idiomaticity of the ST is completely lost, consequently making it more adapted to the TL.

When the numbers of both short stories are added up and grouped according to Gottlieb’s subcategorization, it comes to show that literalization has a significant lead over the second most popular strategy of adherence. This predominant literalization, together with the high number of deletion and the one instance of mistranslation, leads to a significant idiomaticity-loss in the TTs of 80 %. This means that the ST-material was assimilated to the target language paradigms. This domestication means that the natively idiomaticity of the ST is lost, together with the original stylistic, emotive, connotative and pragmatic potential of the ST. Efforts of compensation were recognized at the sentence-level, but are not enough to make up for the high level of idiomaticity-loss. Idiomaticity was kept by means of adherence and compensation in only 20 % cases, leaving only a small percentage of original idiomatic units intact. If compensation occurred beyond the sentence-level, this still means that the text was more TT-oriented, because those efforts were not based on Poe’s original idiomatic style paradigm, but rather on the idiomaticity of the target language.

Overall, the most frequently used strategy in the The Black Cat translations into Croatian is literalization, with a total of 124 occurrences. Together with the six instances of deletion and the single instance of mistranslation, this leads to a significant idiomaticity-loss that was compensated only nine times. The overall idiomaticity loss is 78 %, with idiomaticity being kept through adherence and compensation strategies in only 22 % of all original idiomatic units. This again demonstrates a target text-oriented approach in the translations, where idiomaticity is rendered with non-idiomatic units or completely omitted, which depletes the translation of the ST stylistic value and emotive force. But this is only a general overview of all idiomatic units, since an individual analysis of the translations is needed to recognize the differences between the first translation and the retranslations to identify the differences in idiomaticity being preserved in the individual translations from different time periods.

In Tin Ujević’s translation of The Black Cat literalization was the most frequently used strategy, followed by adherence and two instances of compensation. This translation had no omissions, and therefore, no deletion. Overall, this leads to an idiomacity loss of 71 % which is a rather high percentage that has a significant impact on the stylistic rendering of the TT. Ujević’s translation also had the most instances of adherence of all three translations of The Black Cat. This leads to idiomacity being kept in 29 % of all PU-occurrences. The first retranslation by Nada Šoljan demonstrates a similar distribution of strategies, with literalization again being the most popular choice, followed by adherence and compensation. Of the three translations, Šoljan’s used compensation the most, but it still had a high level of literalization, and only nine instances of adherence. The overall idiomaticity loss is 77 %, which is a six percent increase from Tin Ujević's translation, meaning that it was more TT-oriented and stylistically more distant from the ST than the first translation by Tin Ujević. Idiomaticity was kept in 23 % of cases, showing a steady decline from Ujević's translation.

The newest retranslation by Saša Drach displays a different distribution of translation strategies. While literalization remains the most popular choice, deletion takes the high second place. This high degree of idiomaticity-loss was compensated only three times and the translation only had five instances of adherence. Overall, idiomaticity was kept in only 15 % of the translation, while idiomaticity-loss was at a high 85 %. This shows that each new translation had a greater idiomaticity-loss than the previous one. This makes the first translation by Ujević closest to the ST, while each new retranslation became more target text oriented, which is a trend that is reverse to the assumed TL-oriented approach of the first translation and SL-oriented approach of the retranlations which is assumed by the retranslation hypothesis.

The most frequently used strategy in The Murders in Rue Morgue is again literalization, followed by adherence. While The Black Cat had compensation as the third most frequently used strategy, deletion is significantly more prevalent in The Murders in Rue Morgue, with compensation coming last with only 18 instances. This adds up to a idiomaticity loss of 80 %, a slightly higher number compared to the idiomaticity loss in The Black Cat (78 %). This means that the idiomaticity of the ST was kept in 20 % of all instances, opposed to The Black Cat's 22 %. The increase of idiomaticity-loss in the second short story shows that the second source text was more TT-oriented than the translation of The Black Cat, but it is again necessary to view the individual distribution of the strategies to make definitive conclusions.

Individually, the order of appearances of the translation strategies in Tin Ujević's and Nada Šoljan's translation remains the same, with literalization again being the most frequently used strategy, followed by adherence, compensation and deletion. However, while in The Black Cat adherence was most frequently used in the first translation by Tin Ujević, in The Murders in the Rue Morgue, the first retranslation by Nada Šoljan has a significantly higher rate of adherence strategies than its predecessor. Nada Šoljan’s translation also uses more compensation strategies, while deletion, again, has the same frequency in both translations. Because of these changes, when the strategies are grouped into idiomatic and non-idiomatic ones, the first retranslation by Nada Šoljan ends up having a higher percentage of maintained idiomatic units than the first translation by Tin Ujević. As a result, the first translation has kept the original idiomaticity of the ST in 19 % of cases and Nada Šoljan’s retranslation in 26 %, which makes the idiomaticity-loss lower in the first retranslation (74 %, opposed to Ujević’s 81 %). This makes the first translation more TT-oriented than the retranslation, a result which is in line with the retranslation hypothesis.

In the latest retranslation, literalization is again the most popular choice, however, deletion takes a high second place, with the adherence strategies being placed only third. The three instances of compensation are not enough to make up for this significant idiomaticity-loss. Idiomaticity of the ST is subsequently kept in only 13 % of the translated units, which causes a significant decrease and change in the level of idiomaticity and style of the ST (87 % loss). The newest retranslation is, therefore, significantly less idiomatic than the previous translations, a result which again demonstrates a reverse trend to the retranslation hypothesis.

10. Discussion

The Black Cat

Table 14 Idiomaticity in The Black Cat: Overview

29 % KEPT	23 % KEPT	14 % KEPT	-
71 % LOST	77 % LOST	86 % LOST	-

The first hypothesis was that retranslations of Edgar Allan Poe's The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue into Croatian will be more ST-oriented by using more adherence strategies than the TT-oriented first translations. The results showed that in The Black Cat, idiomaticity was most frequently kept in the first translation by Tin Ujević (29 %), followed by the first retranslation by Nada Šoljan (23 %) and least in the newest retranslation by Saša Drach (14 %). This shows a reverse trend to the retranslation hypothesis as older translations more closely transferred the idiomatic saturation of the ST than the newest translation, with the first translation having twice as many phraseological units preserved than the newest translation. Furthermore, this pattern shows that in the older translations, translators tried to transfer PUs closer to the original, which is a translation norm that might have changed with time, giving the newer translators more freedom in rendering the units. This also means that the first hypothesis has been proved to be false, since the retranslations of The Black Cat into Croatian ended up being more TT-oriented by using fewer adherence and compensation strategies than the first translation.

The Murders in the Rue Morgue

Table 15 Idiomaticity in The Murders in the Rue Morgue: Overview

Tin Ujević (1952)	Nada Šoljan (1974)	Saša Drach (2008)	RH
19 % KEPT	26 % KEPT	13 % KEPT	+/-
81 % LOST	74 % LOST	87 % LOST	+/-

In The Murders in the Rue Morgue, the newest translation again had the lowest number of phraseological units being preserved (13 %). This shows that the newest translation, again, has the lowest frequency of adherence and compensation strategies, meaning that it has the fewest number of instances of idiomaticity kept. This might be explained by the individual preferences of the translator Saša Drach or represent significant changes in the translation norms governing the translation of PUs between 1952 and 2008. On the other hand, the first retranslation of The Murders in the Rue Morgue by Nada Šoljan adheres to the retranslation hypothesis, as idiomaticity was kept in 26 % of PU translations, as opposed to the 19 % in the first translation by Tin Ujević. This means that the original idiomaticity-loss of the first translation was restored in the first retranslation, making the first retranslation more ST-oriented than the first translation and the second retranslation. This is why in the case of The Murders of the Rue Morgue, the first hypothesis that the retranslations will be more ST-oriented by using more adherence strategies than the TT-oriented first translations can be considered partially valid.

The second hypothesis was that the first translations of Edgar Allan Poe's The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue into Croatian will be more TT-oriented by using more literalization and deletion strategies than the ST-oriented retranslations. In The Black Cat the first translation by Tin Ujević had an idiomaticity-loss of 71 %, while the retranslations by Nada Šoljan and Saša Drach had an idiomaticity loss of 77 % and 86 %, respectively. This shows a reverse trend from the formulated second hypothesis and retranslation hypothesis, since the first translation had the lowest idiomaticity loss of the three translations, with the newest exhibiting the highest percentage of idiomatic units being omitted or being rendered as non-idiomatic. This makes the first translation the most TT-oriented, with each new translation being more ST-oriented than the previous one. Therefore, the first translation has retained the most PU-elements and preserved the stylistic and emotive potential of the ST PUs, while in the newer translations the units were lexicalized, which depleted the translations of a vital phraseological layer of Poe's style. This makes the second hypothesis invalid for The Black Cat.

On the other hand, The Murders in the Rue Morgue, again, displays some different tendencies than the first short story. While the newest retranslation by Saša Drach still has the highest percentage of idiomaticity loss (87 %), the first retranslation by Nada Šoljan is the one where the idiomaticity-loss is the least prevalent (74 %), compared to the first translation by Tin Ujević (81 %). This makes the newest translation the most TT-oriented one, followed by the first translation, while the first retranslation is the most ST-oriented. Since the first translation used more literalization and deletion strategies than the first retranslation, the initial hypothesis is valid for the first retranslation, with the newest retranslation being an anomaly in this trend, making the hypothesis only partially valid.

The results show that the retranslation hypothesis is not fully applicable to the translations of PUs in The Black Cat and The Murders of the Rue Morgue. While differences can be observed in the way translators dealt with the problems of translating phraseological units in different time periods, it is not possible to draw definitive conclusions because the corpus encompassed only two short stories and only three translators, so individual preferences of the translators greatly influence the final result. What determines a good and functional translation changes with time and one cannot ignore other factors that cause changes in the form and reception of a translation in a target culture, including social, cultural and political changes. The Croatian language went through various changes in the periods between the first translation of Poe's short stories in 1952 and the newest retranslation from 2008. Recent translations also have an advantage because they can take a critical stance towards the previous translations and can benefit from translation norms becoming less rigid with time. Differences in genre expectations between the languages can also limit the way phraseological units are translated. While The Black Cat is part of the horror fiction genre and requires more picturesque and idiomatic language, The Murders in the Rue Morgue can be categorized as detective fiction where picturesque idiomaticity is not as vital. Furthermore, since The Black Cat is a literary text used as part of the high school curriculum, one must wonder whether the newest translation was influenced by the need for a more concise and simplified form of language needed for this pedagogical function. The abundance of omissions and literalizations in the newest translation might explained by the concise form pressures from the publishers to reduce printing costs, or might be indicative of individual preferences of the translator. Nevertheless, it is important to strive for the appropriate degree of idiomatic PUs in translations because they are important for maintaining the original stylistic integrity of the ST, and they enhance the readability and nativelikeness of a literary text that would be impoverished by their absence. The results of the study show that idiomaticity of the ST was significantly reduced in the TTs because the original ST-idiomaticity was not kept, making the TTs overwhelmingly more TT-oriented. Some compensation attempts have been recognized at the sentence-level, but these do not suffice to accurately restore the evocative language of Poe's fiction that might also be difficult to transfer into a Slavic language. Overall, translators ought to properly transfer the phraseological saturation of the source text, a process which should include a general pre-assessment of the style that needs to be maintained in the translation (Omazić 2015: 143).

It is important to highlight that the corpus was not large enough to draw definite conclusions and relied on a broad definition of PUs, which included low idiomaticity items. Further studies may be conducted with a larger corpus, using different definitions of PUs or other multi-word units to test the hypotheses.

11. Conclusion

The aim of this study was to test whether the phraseological units in the Croatian translations of The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue followed the pattern of the retranslation hypothesis, i.e., whether the first translations are target text oriented, leading to a loss of idiomaticity, while the retranslations are more source text oriented, with idiomatic units being preserved. Phraseological units are vital for a translation for their stylistic, emotive and connotative potential that ought to be preserved in translations to transfer the original naturalness of language. In this study, two short stories by Edgar Allan Poe were selected as source texts, The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue, because of their wide inventory of PUs and because both short stories were translated into Croatian by the same three translators during three different time periods: Tin Ujević in 1952, Nada Šoljan in 1974 and Saša Drach in 2008. These Croatian translations represent a unique corpus through which the first translations of the two short stories and their two different retranslations, that were published in a time span of 56 years, can be compared in order to see how translation practices of PUs have changed with time. A qualitative and quantitative analysis of PU translations was conducted, first by extracting the units using the all-encompassing definition by Marija Omazić (2015), and then categorized according to an extended version of Marija Omazić's categorization, which is based on research highlighting the stylistic value of the native-like idiomaticity of PUs and stresses why it is vital to maintain them in translations. A modified version of Henrik Gottlieb's categorization (1997) was used to group similar translation strategies from Omazić's categorization into adherence, compensation, literalization and deletion. Adherence and compensation were equated with idiomaticity being kept in translations, making them more ST-oriented, while literalization and deletion were examples of idiomaticity being lost and a TT-oriented approach. In line with the retranslation hypothesis, idiomaticity being preserved can be equated with a ST-oriented approach and should appear higher in retranslations than in the TT-oriented first translations. On the other hand, idiomaticity being lost signals a TT-oriented approach that should, according to the retranslation hypothesis, be more frequently observed in the ST-oriented first translations than in the TT-oriented retranslations.

The results showed that, idiomaticity was significantly reduced in the ST-translations and that The Black Cat exhibited a reverse trend to the retranslation hypothesis, meaning that idiomaticity was highest in the first translation, with each new translation exhibiting a gradual loss in idiomaticity. This means that the first hypothesis, that retranslations of Edgar Allan Poe's The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue into Croatian will be more ST-oriented by using more adherence strategies than the TT-oriented first translations was proved to be invalid for the The Black Cat. Furthermore, the second hypothesis that first translations of Edgar Allan Poe's The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue into Croatian will be more TT-oriented by using more literalization and deletion strategies than the ST-oriented retranslations, was also invalid for The Black Cat. However, in The Murders in the Rue Morgue the first retranslation had the highest percentage of idiomaticity being maintained, while the most recent one had the lowest percentage, making the retranslation hypothesis valid for the first retranslation, as well as the first and second hypotheses. Overall, these results suggest that the Croatian (re)translations of The Black Cat and The Murders in the Rue Morgue only partially adhere to the retranslation hypothesis, which assumes that first translations are TT-oriented, while later translations restore the original source text material, meaning that while elements of the retranslation hypothesis can be observed, it is not the norm, due to intratextual and extratextual factors which influence the translation process. It must be noted that the corpus is rather small and is limited to only two short stories and three translators, so there is a need further research into the topic to draw definite conclusions about the way translations of phraseological units follow the assumptions of the retranslation hypothesis.
